

Young children are too easily exposed to violence, which has a proven correlation to negative effects over time.

It is unfair to allow unrestrained televised delivery of violent acts from early morning to late evening when children may be effected by this programming.

Violent acts need restrained, much like cigarettes have been restrained from free access by minors. A programmer should be required to abstain from delivery to minors unless proper restraints (like V Chip, cable programming, signed disclosure and so-forth) are in place.
